1. Getting started

1.9 Charitable Incorporated Organisations

Introduction

The Charitable Incorporated Organisation (CIO) is a new legal form designed specifically for charities.

The key features of a CIO are set out in another of our information sheets, Choosing legal structures, which you should read if you are looking to compare the main types of legal structure available to voluntary organisations.

This information sheet will offer more detailed guidance on the CIO, including the differences between the two CIO models that can be used, the advantages and disadvantages of this structure, and how you can look to register a CIO if you decide it is the best structure for your organisation.

Background

For a long time registered charities have had to register not only with the Charity Commission, but also with Companies House as a Company limited by guarantee if they wish to benefit from charitable status and limit the personal liability of their trustees and members.

The Charities Act 2006 introduced the statutory framework for CIOs, but there were some delays so CIOs have only actually been available since December 2012. The CIO is intended to provide the benefits of incorporation for registered charities, but with a simpler legal framework that is regulated singly by the Charity Commission.

So what is a CIO?

A CIO:

- is an incorporated form of charity which is not a company
- only has to register with the Charity Commission and not Companies House
- is only created once it is registered by the Charity Commission
- can enter into contracts in its own right and its trustees will normally have limited or no liability for the debts of the CIO.

Phased implementation

While the CIO is now available as a legal structure, there is a phased implementation taking place which means that the Charity Commission is only accepting CIO registration applications from specific types of organisations at certain times. The registration timetable has been issued as follows, although this could be subject to change by the Charity Commission if demand for the CIO is significantly more or less than expected:

- Since December 2012 applications have been accepted from brand new charities (i.e. those that have never previously operated or been established through an established governing document) with an anticipated income of over £5,000.
- Since 1 March 2013 applications have been accepted from existing unincorporated charities with an annual income over £250,000, so that they can set up a CIO and transfer assets to it.
- Since 1 May 2013 they have been accepted from existing unincorporated charities with an annual income over £100,000.
- Since 1 July 2013 they have been accepted from existing unincorporated charities with an annual income over £25,000.
- From 1 October 2013 they will be accepted from existing unincorporated charities with an annual income over £5,000.
- From 1 January 2014 they will be accepted from existing unincorporated charities with an annual income under £5,000, and brand new charities with an anticipated income of under £5,000.

A date has not yet been confirmed for when existing incorporated organisations will be able to apply for conversion to a CIO (charitable companies limited by guarantee, community interest companies and charitable community benefit societies), as further regulations need to be approved by Parliament first. It is hoped that the conversion process will be made available sometime in 2014 though.

Two models

There are two models available for a CIO:

1. the foundation model, which is for charities whose only voting members will be the charity trustees; and
2. the association model, which is for charities that will have a wider membership, including voting members other than the trustees.

In practice a CIO using the 'foundation' model will be like an incorporated charitable trust, run by a small group of people (the charity trustees) who make all key decisions. Charity trustees may be appointed for an unlimited time and they will probably appoint new charity trustees.

A CIO using the 'association' model will have a wider voting membership who must make certain decisions (such as amending the constitution), will usually appoint some or all of the charity trustees (who will serve for fixed terms), and may be involved in the work of the CIO.

There are not two different forms of CIO. A CIO with the 'foundation' model could change to the 'association' model if it wanted a wider voting membership. (This could also happen the other way around, but members who were not trustees would be giving up their membership.) Some of the changes would need the Charity Commission's approval.

You can access model constitutions for the foundation and association models on the Charity Commission's website.

What are the advantages?

The main advantages of becoming a CIO are as follows:

- As it is an incorporated structure, the organisation will exist as a legal entity in its own right separate to the board of trustees. This means that it can enter in to contracts and hold property in the name of the organisation, rather than in the name of specific trustees.
- The trustees benefit from the protection of limited liability, provided they have acted properly. For further details on limited liability please read another of our information sheets titled Liability of trustees and governing body members.
- CIOs will only be required to register with the Charity Commission and will not be regulated by Companies House as charitable companies are, therefore avoiding dual registration and the commitments that come with that. This should make for simpler administration processes.
- There will be no charge for filing documents with the Charity Commission as there is when charitable companies have to file documents with Companies House.
- The CIO can have vested in it any permanent endowment held by an unincorporated charity. This can be done by a simple vesting declaration.

And the disadvantages?

The main disadvantages of this structure are as follows:

- Currently the Charity Commission has stated that the registration of a CIO should be completed within 40 working days, which is a lengthy process compared to Companies House's same day registration service for charitable companies. In practice the registration of a CIO is unlikely to take as long as 40 days, but it will still take longer than it would to register a company. This may mean that organisations requiring a very short set up time (for example, appeals created in response to a crisis) are not able to be registered as CIOs.
- Exempt charities cannot register as CIOs, because all CIOs must register with the Charity Commission. You can find further information about what constitutes an exempt charity on the Charity Commission's website.

- As with the point above, charitable status is necessary to be registered as a CIO. Therefore, if the CIO stops being charitable (i.e. it no longer satisfies the Charity Commission's public benefit test) the organisation will cease to exist. This is in contrast to other legal structures such as companies limited by guarantee and unincorporated associations, which can continue to exist with some operational amendments if they no longer wish to continue to be a charitable organisation.
- A charity with an annual income of less than £5,000 is not required to register as a charity, but (as above) all CIOs are/will be required to register with the Charity Commission regardless of their income, and then comply with the requirements relating to such registration.
- While CIOs will be able to register a mortgage on land at the Land Registry, the Charity Commission will not be keeping a searchable register of charges as Companies House do, so there will be no register of any debentures issued by CIOs. Banks often ask for these kinds of security for lending to organisation, therefore the absence of such a register may result in CIOs being less able to access some lending services.

Is the CIO right for you?

The Charity Commission states that it believes the CIO will be most suitable for small to medium sized organisations which employ staff and/or enter into contracts.

If your charity is likely to want to issue debentures, a company limited by guarantee will probably be a better option for you. And while establishing and running a CIO should be simpler than establishing a charitable company, it will not be as straightforward as running an unincorporated association or a charitable trust so one of those structures may be more suitable for you (although they will offer less protection).

Ultimately you will need to consider the different legal structures available and assess which of them would suit your needs best. Further information on different legal structures can be found in another of our information sheets, titled Choosing legal structures, as well as in the Charity Commission's guidance on the structures that are available for charities to use.

Registering as a CIO

If, on reading the information above and in the referenced documents, you have decided that the CIO is the right structure for your organisation you will now need to look to register as a CIO with the Charity Commission. This will, of course, be subject to the implementation table set out above, so you need to check that timetable to see whether you are able to register yet or not.

If you fall within one of the categories that can now register you will need to complete the Charity Commission's online registration process. You will also need to create a constitution for your CIO, choosing between the foundation model and the association model, and you can use the free model constitutions mentioned above which are available from the Charity Commission.

The Charities Act 2011 and the General Regulations don't require you to use a particular wording in your constitution, but the wording in the Commission's models has been carefully considered and informed by experts in the charity sector so it is likely to make the registration process quicker if you use one of them. The Charity Commission do ask that if you are applying to register a CIO and are not using one of the Commission's model CIO constitutions, you should provide two copies of your CIO constitution; one of which is clearly marked up to show any changes or deviations from the Commission's model. This will help to speed up their assessment of your application.

Running a CIO

As with almost any legal structure, there are various requirements in place for running a CIO.

CIOs must send their accounts and their annual report to the Charity Commission within 10 months of the end of their financial year, regardless of their level of income. Both must be sent to the Commission in electronic format, rather than by post.

CIOs with a gross annual income of £250,000 or less can choose to prepare receipts and payments accounts, but CIOs with a gross annual income over £250,000 must prepare accruals accounts. There is nothing to stop a CIO with a gross annual income of less than £250,000 from preparing accruals accounts if it wishes to do so though, or if a funder or lender asks it to prepare accrual accounts.

Anyone over the age of 16 can be a trustee of a CIO except those who:

- have an unspent conviction involving deception or dishonesty
- are an undischarged bankrupt
- have previously been removed from trusteeship of a charity by a court or the Charity Commission
- are subject to a disqualification order under the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986.

A CIO can also have one or more corporate bodies as trustee(s). The General Regulations require all CIOs to keep a register of trustees, as well as a register of members, and details of what must be contained in both of those registers are available on the Charity Commission's website.
